As you can see above, most EV charging networks offer membership plans, which usually come at a monthly fee. If you own a non-Tesla EV, you can still charge your vehicle using Tesla's charging network. For a $12.99 monthly fee, Tesla allows you to charge your non-EV at its Supercharger locations for a lowered rate.

What type of cable do EV stations use?

A lot of public EV stations use Type 2 (7-pin) cables, though you can also find stations using Type 1 (5-pin), which have lower charging speeds. You can also incur a charging penalty (or an idle fee) with some networks if you leave your car plugged in after it's finished charging. This charge will likely differ based on the network you're using.

Do hotels have EV charging stations?

Many hotels have installed Level 2 chargers that EV-owning guests can use for overnight charging. Unfortunately, only 16 percent of public stations so far are Level 3 DC Fast Charging units that can bring a given EV up to a 75 percent state of charge in around a half hour. This is where EV owners can expect the most growth in the coming years.
